Recreating Work History

The AtoZ Reference Database can help people find historical and current business data including addresses and phone numbers. You do need a library card number to login remotely.

Information below from the article The Meaning of Work History in Job Applications:

“When you can't remember your work history, there is information available that you can use to recreate your personal employment history. Below are some suggestions for creating your job history:

- Contact Prior Employers. Contact the human resources departments of your previous employers. Say that you would like to confirm the exact dates of your employment with the company.
- Look at Your Tax Returns. Check out your old tax returns and tax forms, which should have information on your employment over previous years.
- Check with your state unemployment office. Often, unemployment offices will provide individuals with their employment histories. However, they typically only have information on in-state employment histories.
- Contact the Social Security Administration. You can request earnings information from the Social Security Administration (SSA). After filling out a form, the SSA will usually release information on your work history. Keep in mind that sometimes the SSA charges a fee, depending on how far back you want the information to go, and how much detail you need.
- Don’t Pay for Information. With the exception of the SSA, you should not pay someone to find your work history or to create a list of your work history for you.
- Keep Track of Your History. Once you have your work history, compile it into a list and save it somewhere. Be sure to update it regularly. You can then refer to this list any time you apply for jobs.”
