

City readies for next outdoor Sculpture Tour

One of the exciting things the Georgetown Public Library staff does is coordinate the City's arts and culture efforts. Library Director Eric Lashley and Arts and Culture Coordinator Sarah Blankenship have been busy working with the City's Arts and Culture Board this year to update the Sculpture Tour; make arts and culture grants and select public art for new City buildings.

Eighth Street, and outside the Georgetown Recreation Center. Eleven new sculptures will be installed this week by the artists working with Parks and Recreation staff in those locations as well as outside the library, around the Square, by the Georgetown Art Center and at Founder's Park (814 South Church Street). These wonderful outdoor pieces were selected by the Arts and Culture Board and City staff, and they will be available for purchase. Sale proceeds benefit the talented artists (75 percent) as well as the City's Arts and Culture budget (25 percent) to help fund future projects.

- Arts and Culture grants have been awarded for events occurring through March 2019 to
 - Cinematic Symphony for a performance called 100 Years of Bernstein!,
 - Georgetown Poetry Festival,
 - One Day Academy for a theatre performance,
 - Stuart Wallace for a solo art exhibit at the library, and
 - Georgetown Art Works for Art Hop support.
- All events receiving City arts and culture grants must be open to the public. For events occurring April through September, the call will be open December 1-31, candidates will be notified in January and checks will be mailed in February. For events occurring October through March 2020, the call

The City manages an outdoor Sculpture Tour with pieces around town that change annually in November. Parks Superintendent Jamie Beran and his hard-working staff in the Parks and Recreation Department also play an important role in selecting and installing the Sculpture Tour each year — it's a City effort that requires many heads and hands, and sometimes heavy equipment and strong backs.

This week, the nine pieces that have been on display for the past 12 months are being removed and new sculptures installed. One of the pieces being removed, "Thor's Hammer" by Sun McColgin, has been purchased from the artist and will be installed at a new garden style residential community in Georgetown called Kaia Pointe.

This year, staff from the streets and parks departments installed new concrete pads to support sculptures at Ninth and Main streets, in the 200 block of Bob Coffee's bronze sculpture "40 Million Years Too Late" will be installed in the grassy area outside the Ninth Street entrance to the Georgetown Public Library.

will be open June 1-30 and candidates will be notified in July with checks mailed in August. As those who live or work west of the Square know, the City is retrofitting and building a new city hall and municipal court. Both buildings will include public art. Austin artist Jonathon Muzacz's proposal was selected for the municipal court lobby wall. Jonathan will create a large-scale mosaic depicting Lake Georgetown composed of thousands of individual vitreous glass tiles. Muzacz will work from a digital photograph of the lake to create a striking pixelated mosaic that is representational when seen from a distance and becomes more abstract at close range. Kevin Greer, who has his art studio in Hutto, is an abstract painter whose proposal was selected to go above the municipal court transactions window. This piece will be a digital reproduction of paintings done in bright oranges and blues. His proposal noted that these are "abstract paintings stitched together into a collage storyboarding the essence of a day. These color-scapes depict the movement and energy within a day from sunrise to sunset. This work is a reflection on the beauty and inspiration derived from this surrounding landscape." Sarah Blankenship says, "It has been very exciting to see the support the City, Board, and Council have for incorporating arts and culture into everyday life for Georgetown residents. The arts are vital to improving our daily experiences whether they are the main focus or a background setting. We have many plans for the future to continue expanding arts and culture opportunities in our growing city." See you at the library...or around town looking at the art!
